A NEW DEPARTURE.

For some time I have been watching with keen interest the working of the CASH SYSTEM of doing business. Every mercantile man who does a credit business, sooner or later discovers, often greatly to his astonishment, that "there is something wrong in Egypt." As yet only a few, however, have had the courage to apply what must be apparent to every sensible man to the only true remedy. During the comparatively brief time I have been in business my experience has been something as follows:

In the fall every well-to-do customer can be seen on our store, paying cash along as it is unwrapped; in most instances, when a year has rolled round, I find that I have from $2 000 to $3,000 scattered all over the country, varying in amount from $1 to $60, while during the year I have been obliged to pay a heavy rate of interest to meet engagements as they fell due. Among all these amounts a certain number will of course be slow, and I am obliged, no matter how reluctantly, to hold over a portion, perhaps the whole of the amount in the hope of both of them meet your wishes in a few instances the whole account is a dead loss. In doing a credit business I am obliged to charge a sufficient profit to meet these expenses and to see, or sooner or later go to the wall.

The credit business is financially neither safe nor satisfactory, and I have, after mature deliberation, decided to break loose from it and in future do a legitimate and give those of my customers who pay their way as they go the advantage in cheap goods. I will no longer be a party to the system which obliges one man to pay for the fault his neighbor owes.

From and after the First day of January I will Sell for Cash and Cash Only!

In making this important announcement I wish to add that I will sell

GROCERIES AND PROVISIONS

CHEAPER THAN EVER BEFORE SOLD IN THESE COUNTIES.

I will have no losses to provide against—what the goods or the money still to be in my possession. I will have no interest to pay, and I am afraid to sell at a less dollar margin.

My facilities for buying cheap are unsurpassed. I can purchase goods as cheap as any one, and I will sell them at a smaller margin.

I would ask my old customers not to be frightened at this change but to try investigate it. I am doing it in your interest as well as my own. Call and I will convince you of this fact in your first order. The refraction will be so marked that you will be astonished.

Remember, in future

ANDERSON'S WILL BE THE CHEAPEST PLACE IN THE COUNTIES FOR GROCERIES AND PROVISIONS.

I KEEP EVERYTHING in my line, of the very best.

I wish to notify all those customers to whom I have been giving credit that all accounts must be closed at once, either by cash or note. I will throw away all books on the first day of January, and before that time I must have a settlement with every one.

Give me a call and get the advantage of this change to cheap groceries.

Cash will do it, and if you want to save money buy from

Yours truly,

W. ANDERSON.

MATTERS DRAMATIC

SHAKESPEARE fixed the age of Juliet at 14, but on the stage the necessity of actresses capable of playing the part makes an extension of the limit necessary. Miss Ada Rehan, however, is to have a fourteen-year-old Juliet in the person of a juvenile prodigy.

"MICHEL STROGOFF," the spectacular drama recently put upon the stage at the Chatelet, in Paris, has cost over $80,000 to produce, and the nightly expenses are $1,8000. As the house only holds $2,700, it is obvious that the piece must run for over a year, if it is to be a profitable speculation.

THE Fan on Play performed at Ostermeer, during the past season realized $80,000. A salaam of $25,000, after deducting expenses, was divided between the performers. The pieces who promoted the Nawaab got the largest share, namely, $3000. Julia realized more than the thirty pieces of silver. Ten disciples were paid $100 each, and the women of the drama realized very little.

FROM YORICK'S SKULL.—Mr. Florence relates that the elder Booth, while playing Hamlet to a Virginia town, found himself without the important skull. A little darkey volunteered to get one. When Booth was leaving the theatre he felt some one tugging at his coat tail. He looked around and saw the little nigger. "What will you have, sonny?" "Please, say, I want daddy's skull, say." "Daddy's skull!" "Yes, sah. De need to be de ole man's to-bacco jahr do 'emved kicked him, sah." "and my'll look nice to rage if I look at."

REMARKABLE LACE.—I once saw in Paris a magnificent peignoir, made for Mme. Judic. On the skirt was the loveliest tablier at rock lace I ever beheld. The dress was displayed on account of that lace; and that lace was worth, perhaps, $2c. For it was paper, wonderfully stamped, and representing the cost of fashions, and looked just as much like real lace as a Paris diamond by night looks on cold mine gem. Parisian actresses wear that paper lace a great deal; it is cool, and very effective. To wear a costly lot of lace, which may be ruined in a night, when $5 worth of lace paper looks as well, is considered the height of folly by intelligent foreigners.

PETTICOAT AND TROUSERS.—Some rules on the subject are having occurred at the Market Drayton Theatre. The company were preparing the "Pirates," when, during the hymn to the sun, the lights being placed very close to the transparency representing that luminary, it, unfortunately, took fire; the stage was also playing the high tide to show real the occasion just after wrecking the words, "Oh power supreme, so, in the utmost consternation, cried out to the stage manager, "The sun's on fire," then proceeding with the hymn, "Oh power supreme, &c. " — your room, put out the sun, I say." The sun, however, continued to blaze on the scene, notwithstanding their fears, were convulsed with laughter. The audience being at last extinguished, the play proceeded.

Russia and China.

"The interests and dignity of Russia require," declared that the Chinese question shall be speedily brought to an end—to any further misunderstandings, without such trouble to themselves, and to spread peace of millions of realities, and that at the time when we really need every trouble for the support of our home-stricken people."

In such harsh terms does the Gazette speak of the successful policy of the Czar's Government toward China, and the journal seems to have expressed the general opinion of the police. A more glaring case of contrast between Russia and China will rather be shown the immense superiority and stability of the Celestial Empire to those of the Czar. The Tsien Government, without declaring war against the St. Petersburg Government, actually managed to put its formidable soldier's name to end to an extensive almost equal to that of an actual war. The Kuldja troubles alone took out of the Czar's treasury over two millions of roubles, and the Kuldja province is as far from being finished as ever before; it promises to be an apple of discord between the two neighbouring countries.

Accordingly early in the present since the Chinese Government refused to ratify the treaty of Livadia, concluded by the unhappy Tchun. How? During that period of time Russia has been in a constant fear of war, who has been raising forts on her eastern frontier, sending out hazardous and costly expeditions, and transferring her men-of-war in the Pacific Ocean. Now a counterbalance Russia may be encountered in the Admiral Pihin, under the command of Admiral Lessovsky, and, at a cost of millions of roubles, is constantly kept ready for battle. But the Chinese Government is so far from

The Iron Duke.

"CHARACTERISTIC TRAITS OF THE WORK OF WELLINGTON."

Lord Grey, who spent the Sevres of his manhood in unwilling retirement, has just sent up a volume of the great duke's despatches. After perusing many pages, he said, in answer to a question, he was "filled to the brim" with admiration for the greatness of the man who was dead. Words were uttered in a tone of deliberate conviction; but one doubts whether many thoughtful persons would ratify such a judgment. Perhaps the Greats is the one testament of sympathetic union between Wellington and his officers. After his elevation to the premiership he was commonly spoken of in camp as "the Pope," partly, no doubt, to distinguish him from certain lords who were not peers. A glimpse of this subject I remember in my youth talking to an old Spanish priest who was quite enthusiastic in his admiration of "el gran lord," whom he well remembered in Madrid when he considered the greatest of all the English. Not one of the French generals was worthy to tie the latchet of his shoes, and thought the Padre. The severity with which the duke put down plunderers was considered altogether extraordinary in this priest, who had liberal ideas to boil of the soldiers of Massena and Marmont. Light and shade, however, must be equally thrown into every picture; and there is an ugly little story of one of those Peninsular campaigns which she can never forget; it is of a soldier who acted as the duke's servant, and who was one day employed in "brushing up hessians to make a mess for Lord Wellington's hounds"—the poor fellow very much longing to eat some of the biscuit himself. "But no man gets unto him," humbly was a reply intimes for this combination of a starving soldier and well-fed hessian.

The part of Wellington's life which has been the most conveyed is his civil service; outwardly as I think. He no doubt considered grave faults; but he was honest and courageous to a degree. A curious instance of the latter quality may be seen in his conversation with George IV., who conceived that his "honor" forbade him to accept Canning as a minister. "I can't Arthur, I can't as a gentleman—as I"—"Your majesty is not a gentleman," replied the duke to the startled king, and proceeded to explain to him that a sovereign was not a gentleman, because something more. The king gave way. On a subsequent occasion the duke showed equal courage but more tact. George IV., as is well known labored under the hallucination that he had been present at Waterloo. One day, at a state banquet, he made this amazing statement, and appealed to the duke for confirmation. "Your majesty has often told me so," replied Wellington. I need not that the duke's opinion of George IV., was on the whole a favourable one." He exhibited him as an astounding jumble of conflicting qualities, in which, however, the good decidedly predominated over the bad. "The king was a very kind-hearted man."

The duke cared little to talk of his campaigns, at least to civilians. He was not the man to "fight all his battles again" for the benefit of a mixed audience. A foolish lady once asked him to "give her an account of the battle of Waterloo." There is nothing, ma'am, madame," he answered, "the French pounded us, and we pounded the French, and I suppose we pounded the hardest, for they ran." He was never much of a reader, and seemed (in his later years at all events) to know the bible better than any other book. When at home he usually went regularly every morning to the Chapel Royal at St. James's.

Speaking of his habits, I may mention a curious one—by no means recommendable, as a rule, to persons wishing to prolong their lives—that the duke lived to 83. After dinner, about the time when other persons would take tea, he had a couple of tumblers full of iced water brought him; and these he would insist before going to bed. For the rest he was not a whale in point of size of a gourmand. At one time he took a very light breakfast (tea and roll, or tea and toast; and nothing more till as 8 o'clock dinner. A French paper sometimes ventured to assert that the great duke had died of a surfeit of apple pudding. "Qualle mort peu glorieuse! it added. As a matter of fact, I have heard that this homely dish was the last but one beneath of on earth. He really died of an affection of the air.

He was very hospitable, especially at Walmer, but had his own notions on the subject of equality. Thus he had once asked Lord Grey to come down (in a professional capacity) to entertain some illustrious guests whom he was expecting. On Grist's arrival the duke was very civil to the lady, and asked her, among other questions as to what hour she would like to dine. Grist replied with her most gracious smile, that his grace's hour, whatever it might be, would suit her. The duke bowed, and the prism down became his guest; but he had not at all intended it. And yet he once asked a clock-maker who had come to repair the clocks at Walmer to dine, though this invitation, too, is believed to have originated in a mistake. The duke himself was the head of a famous firm had arrived in person to do the work; and issued the invitation accordingly. It was however a mere matter as who had been sent, and the the duke was too good natured not to make a gentleman to withdraw it when he learned the fact. "He is a man of science," quoth Wellington, and that was enough for him. It was a high honour—for which my human being, I suppose, would have almost begged—to dine at Lord Grey's—excepting the epicurean Lord Sefton. That nobleman had a very poor opinion of the duke's table, and once asked to dine—to one of those exquisite little banquets at which he is never happy—he gave Lord Sefton was much piqued at the duke's evident want of appreciation of his cook's triumphs; and at length after couple after couple past and retire from the visitation, Wellington, who had learned that it seemed excellent, but that, for his part, he never paid any attention to what he ate. "Why," said Lord S., with an oath, to a friend by whom he told the story, "did he come and dine with me then?" And certainly Duke Wellington showed a want of good taste in many matters than one on the occasion.

The duke was not easily annoyed "even of science"—like "lawyers," who seemed to him to be possessed of the devil to worry his town rooms. He looked upon them pretty much as a king of the twelfth century would upon a "clerk" who "did not could do a sum in the rule of three. His opinion of lawyers, he declared, was "improved" for the learning that was in him." On one occasion he ventured to "spar" with the chancellor in the House. "My lord," he said, "you will be remembered in history, not for your efforts in abolishing slavery, or reforming, or the law, or changing our constitution,—but simply from giving your name to a new style of carriage. "And your grace will not be remembered for Waterloo or Victoria, or Waterloo, but for a new style of boot." "I—I—the boot, I had forgotten them," naively replied Wellington.

Wellington had not, by the way, that lofting bearing which is supposed to be inseparably associated to him. He quite understood and respected the motives of self-interest in others. "Now, Graham," the former, at all events, however well-meaning, were imperfect motives for any man to be constantly carried on." Graham was a man of

An old lady of No. 80 Park-street called upon Dr. Gill with a grievance. The doctor's neck-bands were too long for her ideas of ministerial humility, and after a long harangue on the sin of pride, she intimated that she had brought her own with her, and would be pleased if her dear pastor would allow her to clip them down to her notion of propriety. Poison Rings.

Prince rings fall exist, says a London paper, in many artistic kinds, celebrated. They are generally of a massive character, and of no small degree of destruction to its wearer, the other being a convenient receptacle for holding a deadly poison. Twenty years ago a ring of the latter description was presented to a certain Italian nobleman as an own love and affectionate friend, who wished to give proof of his friendship by holding a dose. The gentleman, accepting it on his finger, received from the donor a warm shake, and soon after left the friend. His hand and arm very soon began to swell, and he died, in a day or two, of a disease which puzzled the most skilful medical practitioners. An examination of the ring revealed the mechanism of the trap and the manner in which it was worked. The ring was a peculiar one, and that a gentleman's mother had long possessed it, and had often admired it. She could not help thinking that the poison rings were a thing of the past.

know that sixty years ago she was at Paris, and created a furore by her beauty—they called her the Muscovite Venus. Those were the good old days, just before the fall of the monarchy in 89, when every one, ladies and all, played at faro. One evening she lost a large sum to the Comte de Provence, the king's brother. Oh her return she took off her patches, disheveled her hair, had, they tragically say, several, internal fits, and beat of her ill luck. My defunct grandfather (peace to his ashes) was a species of financial secretary to his wife. He feared only her and the devil—the last, the least. But when she confided to him the amount she had lost, he almost rose to the ceiling, flew into a terrible passion, and refused to pay a single franc. My grandmother was like a woman of spirit—she slapped his face, and passed the night in another room. The next day, however, she returned to the attack.
Tears this time; but it was useless. Her long-suffering husband declared that she had almost wanted half a million, and it might as well end one time as another.

"Fortunately for her, an idea occurred by which she did not fail to profit. There was at that time in Paris a certain strange individual who was known by the name of the Comte de Saint-Germain. You have doubtless heard of him. He was looked upon as the wandering Jew, and was reputed to possess the secret of the philosopher's stone and the elixir of life as well. Despite the mystery surrounding him, he was much sought after and was universally liked.
Well, she wrote to him requesting him to grant her an interview. He was punctilious, hastened to her house, and found her plunged deeper, the subject of her grief, her fortune, the cruelty of her husband, and begged him to assist her. After reflecting, a few moments, Saint-Germain replied:

"'Madame, I am easily used yes the money you require, but I will trust you. You will have no peace until you repay me. do not wish to extricate you from one difficulty only to plunge you into another.
There is but one course open to you—you must win the money back again.'

"'But, my dear count,' said my grandmother, 'I've already told you that I haven't a franc.'

"'You do not need money,' he replied; 'listen.' And then he confided to her a secret for which any one of you, gentlemen, would give ten years of his life.

All the young officers listened with intense interest. Tomski paused a moment, lit his cigar, and continued:

"That evening she went to the queen's game at Versailles. The consul de Portugal was banker, the game faro. She told him some feminine fib or other for not having yet paid her debt, and then began to play. She won every card—first one—then another—and doubled it on the next—she won the third time again she doubled it—and she won.

"Phew!' he—pare luck!' cried one of the officers.

"A fable," said Hermann.

"But," said Naremoff, "if you have a grandmother who possesses such secrets, my dear fellow, why don't you endure her to confide in you?"

"That is the devil of it," replied Tomski.
"She had three sons besides my father—desperate gamblers all of them. Not one ever succeeded in gaining the privilege they so ardently desired. But you remember my uncle, Count Ivan Ilitch—he was favourite of the old lady. Well, one day he asked Zavitch three hundred thousand roubles.
He was reduced to beggary. The old countess took pity upon him, and, after accepting a pledge upon his honour that he would never play again, she told him the mystic series of cards. He sought Zavitch and demanded his revenge. He first lost two fifty thousand roubles; his second—but it is 5 o'clock, gentlemen, and time to break up. You all know how it ended; he beat his opponent, who blew out his brains. My uncle never played again."

The old Countess Fedorovna was seated in her room before the mirror. Her maids surrounded her, holding rouge, powder and patches. The countess knew well no longer pretended to beauty, but she retained the habits of her youth. Her occupation was engaged in heavy work.

"Grandmother," said a young officer, as he entered the room, "I have a favour to ask," and he stepped and kissed her withered, old hand.

"What is it, Paul?"

"I want to present one of my brother officers, and to beg an invitation for him to your next ball."

"Bring him to the ball and present him there. Were you at the princess' last night?"

"Yes; a splendid entertainment; we danced until 5 o'clock. What a charming creature is the Countess Elenski!"

"Oh, my dear Paul, you are really pleased. You should have seen her grandmother, the Prince Potrovna! She must be very old now!"

"The Princess Potrovna!" cried Tomski, shrieking; "why, she has been dead these seven years!"

He checked himself immediately. Lan-bette, the manpoline, was making signs to him. He had forgotten that it was for-bidden to speak of the death or any of the countess' aged friends.

"Dead!" said she; "well, well! I did not know it. We were letters of honor together when we were girls. I remember the first time she was presented at court," and the old lady sighed as she thought of her vanished youth and beauty. Then, her mood changing, she gaily bade me talk with Lizabeth While I am dressing. Tomski, return to my self-love! Help me to get up, Lizabeta. and the old countess passed behind the screen.

"Who is this officer you wish to present to the countess?" asked Lizabeta Ivanovna, in a low tone. "Is he engaged?"

"No, in the hussars. His name is Naremoff. But why do you ask me?"

"Don't present him, Tomski, but did not answer;

"I will, I must be off. Good-by, grandmother. Good-by Lizabeta. Why did you ask if he was in the engineers. And seeing knowingly, the young officer withdrew.

Lizabeta Ivanovna sighed, and recommenced her work.

The young girl's life was an unhappy one.
To eat another's bread is always bitter, but who could paint the miseries of a companion to a lady of quality? Brought hither and yon, the countess showed her because she servants circle the eager. When she read to her, the countess held her responsible for the author's dullness. When she went out with her, the countess scolded her if the weather was bad. Often she would retire, after a day of misery, to her little room and weep bitterly over the affronts she had endured.

One morning, a few days before the scene just related, she was seated at her window, working, when she perceived a handsome young officer gazing at her from the street.
She averted her gaze, and applied herself with redoubled assiduity to her work. After a few moments she looked up, and he was still there. For more time he continued to gaze at her window, and disappeared. The next day he was there again. The day after, as she and the countess were about getting into the carriage, she saw him standing, muffled in a large fur cloak, watching her. His bright eyes followed her every movement. Lizabeth sighed, despite herself. From that moment a deep interest of glamour was begun.

Hermann (for the reader will have guessed that it was he) had a small fortune, but, for an officer, was poor. In order to preserve himself from the vices of his companions, he raised never to play, and lived within his means. He was very ambitious, and kept his secrets. Under his reserve, however, smoldered the most violent passions. He had great self-control, and was cautious. In his gambler, he never touched a card. He passed whole nights with a number of gamblers, favoured by the passion of play, but never indulging in it. The story of the Comte de Saint-Germain and Naremoff made a vivid impression upon his mind. He could think of nothing else.

"Ah," he said to himself, "if she old countess would only tell me her secret! or she would but tell me a number on three winning cards! I must be presented to her. I must gain her confidence. She is 87 years old—87! She might die this week—the night she is necessary—I could be alone with her!" And he dug his nails into the palms of his hands as he thought of it.

Hermann was a man of will, and did not falter in his determination to possess himself of the secret. He observed the pretty young girl who acted as companion to the countess, and resolved to use her as a tool to further his ends. Not for a moment did a thought of the misery he might cause her make him falter. He used every means to open a correspondence with her. He bribed the servants. He confided notes to the waiters who waited upon the countess for orders.
At length his perseverance was rewarded.
Lizabeta answered him. Her first letter was a somewhat cold note, chiding him for his rash persistence. But the ice was broken. In a subsequent letter she was less reciprocated, and at last she consented to a rendez-vous. With the rashness with which timid women sometimes have she appointed the countess' house for the place. In her letter she said:

This evening there is to be a ball at the German ambassador's. It will remain there until 2 o'clock. As soon as we start for the ball, which will be about 11, the servants will immediately retire to the servants' hall.
But one will remain, the footman at the door, and he probably will be asleep. Come as soon as you see us leave, and go upstairs.
If you find anyone in the ante-chamber tell him you have come to see me, and you will be told she is not, and you must resign yourself and go. It is not probable that you will meet anyone, however. When you are in the ante-chamber take the door to the left, and you will find yourself in my bedroom corridor. There, behind a tall screen, you will see two doors—one opens into the closet, the other upon a stairway, which leads to——

Hermann's eyes glazed like those of a beast of prey as he read the note. Already he saw the morning before his eyes the heaped gold and bank-notes, the cards, the green cloth of the gambling table. He saw himself in imagination playing card after card, winning sum on sum, and pocketing the bank-notes as he lost nothing. His imagination was excited with feverish impatience the arrival of the hour.

At 11 o'clock he was waiting in front of the countess' door. The night was stormy; the wind moaned fitfully, the snow gave forth an innumerable flakes; the air was severe and the deserted street. From time to time the footfall of a belated passer-by broke the silence. With the rashness with which
